THE LARGE FORMAT PRINTING DIFFERENCE

Large format printing, also commonly known as “grand format printing” or “digital wide format printing”, refers to the largest width possible for commercial printing, which is up to 16 feet wide. The process is performed with the use of computer software, which controls the application of ink via jet nozzles. These nozzles spray the ink onto rolls of stock fed incrementally into the printer, thereby producing the desired image.

UV inks are typically used in the large format printing process. This results in high quality images, with easily readable text. UV ink also produces images that are extremely resistant to fading caused by sun exposure or environmental conditions. In some cases, solvent-based inks are used in order to produce a specific effect.
